The McGill Global Health Programs Office has recently launched a new program, the Global Health Grads, designed to support currently enrolled McGill graduate students (Masters and PhD) engaged in global health research projects.

Eligible projects involve international travel to a low or middle income country or travel to Northern Canada. Students will receive up to $5,000 which can cover travel costs, dissemination costs, and a small stipend.

The research submitted for funding consideration must be related to the student's thesis or graduation requirements and must be conducted under the supervision of a McGill faculty member. During the 2018-19 academic year, the Global Health Grads will benefit from a series of global health workshops and trainings organized by GHP.
